A Short Description:

The theme for this workshop, "How do we remember?", responds to Murshidabad's significance as a historical site. With this workshop, we connect to an optional course on 'History as Representation: Theoretical Context and Practical Application', jointly organised by Subhas Chandra Bose Centenary College, Lalbagh and National Museums Scotland, Edinburgh which has been running since September 2025 (until January 2026). The course examines the memories of two men, Captain Archibald Swinton and Mirza Sheikh I'tisam-ud-Din, who were closely involved in the historical events that shaped the relationship between the Nawabs of Bengal and the East India Company in the 1760s.

In this week-long workshop, we will bring together the past and the present under the overarching theme of "How do we remember?" Participating students would take the comparative reading of the two men's diaries further to consider two questions:

- 1. How did Captain Archibald Swinton and Mirza Sheikh I'tisam-ud-Din remember the events through which they lived?*
- 2. How are these events remembered today?*

The students will be asked to produce creative works in response to these questions. The proposed exhibition on Saturday, 14 February, will display their artwork and reflective posters. A full day of events also includes a book presentation and panel discussion. Together with the exhibition, they will take the question of 'How do we remember' into the future by asking how we can create fruitful dialogues between Murshidabad and Edinburgh.

Prof. Roger Jeffery & Friederike Voigt (Editors)

Bio Notes:

Roger Jeffery is Emeritus Professor of Sociology of South Asia at the University of Edinburgh, where he worked from 1972 to 2024. He has written widely on north Indian society, based on intensive fieldwork in villages north-east of Delhi, as well as on health policy in South Asia. His edited collections include volumes on social forestry, women's education and fertility, contemporary Uttar Pradesh, and the marginalisation of ethnic and religious minorities in India. He co-founded Edinburgh University's Centre for South Asian Studies in 1987 and is Associate Director of its Edinburgh India Institute, which he founded in 2012. Since 2015, he has been researching the 'footprint' of India in Edinburgh. He edited India in Edinburgh, 1750s to the Present (New Delhi: Social Science Press, 2019 and Abingdon, Oxon and New York: Routledge, 2020).

Friederike Voigt is Principal Curator of the West, South and Southeast Asian collections at National Museums Scotland in Edinburgh, which she joined in 2008. She is fascinated by how museum collections encapsulate human thinking and concepts. Her research investigates the perspectives of individuals involved in the British Empire in India in relation to the objects they contributed to these collections. Her scholarship has informed special exhibitions, permanent galleries and partnership work with South Asian communities. Believing that museums play critical roles in the shaping of society, she uses her curatorial expertise to diversify the voices represented in them. Currently, she leads on a multidisciplinary study of historical paintings from eighteenth-century Murshidabad, Bengal. The project sheds new light on interactions between local artisans and European customers and involves collaborations with communities in India and Scotland.
